

THE INFORMING OF SARAH

BY GERTRUDE MAJOR, author of "The Revelation in the Mountain," etc.

Sarah was 15 before she could induce one to tell her the story of her death. That there was a story was certain, but no one would tell until Mrs. Harris finally consented to do so, but she said afterward that she would rather have taken a whipping than to have done it, but Sarah didn't put off any longer, and she didn't know as there was any one now, excepting her pa and her mother, that knew more of the real than she did.

She always began to cry here and there, from the depths of her apron, which she always held over her face when she wept, that it did seem as if it were such a thing as the dead entering the guilty living, that he could see and aches scared out of his body long ago, not but what might be haunted; chances was that was when you come to think how it was that Sarah's ma died, almost as if that had been for fear she would do her something, and if she felt a way.

Mrs. Harris was ignorant of all rules of story-telling, but she was apt to be a poor listener before she had learned through the preliminaries and to unfold her plot. One could imagine how hard it must have been for little Sarah to have been told of the old lady's death, and how she waited for years before her mother's story.

"Of course, when your pa came after and said they were expecting you, she was just that—but that she wanted me to come and be with her, I was glad enough to go. Always liked your ma; she was a real young woman and had very nice, kind ways. She was educated a little more than me, why, she had night school, cast, before she ever came here and took up with your pa. She was a real young woman and had very nice, kind ways. She was educated a little more than me, why, she had night school, cast, before she ever came here and took up with your pa.
